From Eburon Publishers, Delft : Indigenous Peoples: Self-determination, Knowledge and Indigeneity before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Indigenous Peoples: Self-determination, Knowledge and Indigeneity:

Achieving political recognition from their native countries continues to be one of the most contentious struggles for indigenous peoples. In this book, scholars from a variety of disciplines assess how indigenous groups are inventing and challenging new modes of identity, whether legal, cultural, artistic, or economic. Through the examples of cultural development in the United States, Australia, Guatemala, and other countries, the authors discuss the role of opposing ideals such as national unity and ethnic diversity, assimilation and self-determination in forming indigenous identities. This authoritative volume will change the way scholars consider the position of indigenous peoples around the globe.

About the Author Henry Minde is professor of history at the University of Troms, Norway. He is the author of Becoming Visible: Indigenous Politics and Self-Government and Indigenous Peoples: Resource Management and Global Rights, the latter also published by Eburon.
