confidence in the justice system to the core." -- Howard Burns, President, Calgary Police Association
This book is a valuable story for all police officers to read. It shows the importance of a thorough investigation and note taking. It also speaks to how badly things can go when political interference and public pressure can take over and cause tunnel vision in an investigation.--John Orr, Director, Calgary Police Association

By Gail Radford-Ross
In 2000, the decade-old freezing death of First Nations 17 year-old, Neil Stonechild, became a world-wide media storm of suspicion, accusations, false evidence, and faulty memories against the supposedly racist Saskatoon Police Service in Saskatoon, Canada. A Commission of Inquiry to determine the facts was called. Two officers with impeccable reputations, Larry Hartwig, then 41, and Brad Senger, 36, would pay the price with the loss of their jobs, benefits, reputations and ruination of their lives. Although the innocent officers had worked with individuals and groups of natives, both in their police duties and in their private lives, they were accused of racism but never charged with anything, thereby leaving them unable to defend themselves in court.
Their accuser was aboriginal Jason Roy, 26, who, at the time of Stonechild's death in 1990, had been 16 and already had convictions for robbery, possession of stolen property over $1,000 and an attempt to obstruct justice. When the RCMP began investigating in 2000, Roy, the sole witness, had already been caught lying to police, using four different aliases on at least four different occasions.
In 2000, four years after kidnapping and robbing a citizen at knifepoint, and with 50 known run-ins with the law, Jason Roy became the RCMP's star witness indeed, the only witness claiming to have seen police involvement in their investigation implicating two reputable police officers in the freezing death of Neil Stonechild.
The RCMP based their entire case on the ever-changing, uncorroborated word of a convicted felon! What were they thinking? And why didn't they get him to take a polygraph as they'd demanded of the police officers they believed to be involved?
After disinterring Stonechild's body 11 years after his death, the Alberta Chief Medical Examiner reported: there is no evidence of any injury or other natural disease process to refute the original [1990] autopsy findings and conclusions...(that Stonechild died an accidental death with no assault or bleeding.)
Author Candis McLean, a hard-hitting award-winning journalist for many years, has a family history of not only helping the native community but actually saving many of their lives. Her grandfather, Dr. George Ferguson, was for many years medical-director of the three tuberculosis sanatoria in Saskatchewan. In 1936, the death rate for Native infants in their first year was 1,603 per 100,000; by 1948, it was down to 17 per 100,000 a nearly 100% improvement. Dr. Ferguson was made honorary Indian Chief Muskeke-O-Kemacan Great White Physician.
Who was involved in destroying innocent police officers lives? The RCMP, lawyers, judges, the Saskatchewan government, native groups, journalists, and many who believed in political correctness rather than facts.
Commissioner David Wright, who believed the word of a convicted felon over the impeccable reputations of two police officers, stated: I conclude by commending Jason Roy for his tenacity in pursuing this matter over many years.
As Wallace Gilby Craig, a judge for 26 years in Vancouver's Provincial Criminal Court states: Without impartiality, injustice prevails.
This travesty of Canadian justice is a must-read for all police officers as well as for anyone who cares about rampant politically-correct injustice in our world today.

Two officers described as 'God's gift to the Native community' were never tried in a court of law, yet implicated through a public inquiry in a decade-old Aboriginal freezing death, and fired. All this during a time of great confusion, beneath an emotional cloud of alleged racism. The cold, hard fact is: now the dust has settled, not a single Saskatoon police officer was ever found involved in a single freezing death. Citizens are asking: 'If, the justice system can assign blame to two reputable officers without any real evidence - how safe are we?'
